Comments for Public Posting: Strong support. A tax to punish landlords for leaving units vacant is a key step in fighting our housing crisis.

Comments for Public Posting: I've been a resident of the 5th district of Los Angeles for 13 years and I support the Empty Homes Penalty. With the current housing crisis, it is immoral and unconscionable that there are so many units standing empty in this city. Housing should be a right, but this is a step in the right direction. These landlords get rich by bleeding us dry.

Comments for Public Posting: Please. The unaffordability of housing is strangling the working people of this city, the people that make it go and are required make it prosper, and this would be a corrective force to help bring housing prices down from the artificially high rents they are now. There are so many vacant rentals, and prices are still not coming down- more need to be done to incentivize property owners to rent at more reasonable rates, if their current stance is to not rent at all.

Comments for Public Posting: Please move forward with this small but important step toward increasing the number of available units for rent in LA. This incentive to motivate landlords not to drag their feet in filling vacancies (for whatever reason) is the bare minimum the city can do. While this will not meaningfully improve affordability, the city must play its role in ensuring the housing market is regulated by policies that maximize the housed population at all times. I am somewhat shocked to discover it has not been doing so thus far.
