Summary: The City’s efforts to explore and advance a Municipal (public) Bank of Los Angeles raises numerous concerns, including but not limited to the potential for public funds to be used to financially support a political policy agenda, political bias in lending, and concerns about who would oversee this bank. In addition, a public bank would merge two distinct institutions – government and financial institutions – causing a lack of checks and balances and a massive overreach of government. Moreover, the ability to respond to concerns would be cumbersome and slow because they would be addressed through a lengthy democratic process instead of a nimble and responsive private banking business. There is only one public in all of the US, as of today, perhaps for a reason – it is a bad idea. In addition, the voters in LA already rejected Measure B (to create a Public Bank) in 2018, opposing this idea with 58% of the vote.
