Summary: The Wilshire Center Koreatown Neighborhood Council (WCKNC) writes to express our support for Council File 20-0769-S1, a motion instructing the Los Angeles Fire Department (LAFD) to present a plan to expand the Advanced Provider Response Units (APRU) and to report on the resources needed to integrate mental health and social work professionals into the LAFD's APRU's to respond to non-violent and non-criminal calls. APRU's consist of responders that have specialized training to provide advanced on-scene medical care to patients who may not require immediate transportation to the emergency room. The goal was to make more efficient use of ambulance and emergency medical treatment resources, and a pilot study shows that the program led to significant decreases in the use of emergency medical services. APRU's can redirect mental health patients to more appropriate facilities and address the needs of vulnerable Angelenos who might be better assisted by non-emergency care and services, instead of armed responses by law enforcement engaging in unnecessary use of excessive force and violence, over-incarceration of community members in need of access to health care and services, and draining valuable public resources. We are in full support of the proposed motion and believe this will facilitate greater integration of mental health and other social services professionals to allow APRU's to respond appropriately to a greater number of non-violent mental health related 911 calls. By responding to the needs of our communities with non-law enforcement solutions oriented around harm reduction, this new system has the potential to transform the health and safety of our city, minimize the need for police response, increase public safety, save valuable community resources, and more appropriately meet the needs of the most vulnerable members of our community. We urge you to develop and implement the unarmed crisis response model proposed.
